ions were put in. He thought this power such criminals as they were ought to be ought to possess, as they ought not to be ought to the maintenance in goal of the characters. England could not do this.
He knew that the answer with which abolition have had the advantage of the of these men—had a right to have the of keeping them if they turned out to be iniquitous. He could not assume the of this. But admitting that the argument did apply to convicts sent from England to this colony, whose labour they exploited, at all events would not apply to convicts sent to this colony from the English colonies. He thought that the have received no advantage as the colony ought not to be burdened with them.
This amendment, therefore, it would be proposed, by the

(Mr. Lamb), which he considered meant a reply to the question proposition made to the Council by Mr. Jones (Jowett) : that proposition was a mere naked question, and answer should not be renewed, and the assertion was altogether unsupported by argument of any sort. Now the question which was asked was supported by argument, it showed that while the Council supposed to the renewal of any Council dissolution or conviction, it was really supported by the Imperial Government in a systematic and systematic reformatory system, admitting exiles under the conditions of before alluded to. He believed that and did wish to carry out such a system and he did feel that it was their duty to express their sympathy with the and did feel the duties of the British Empire, this colony was willing to contribute them in a scheme so philanthropic and so it was true, as had been urged by the the previous evening, that there were alive, and deterring at the very portals of great question; but this should not prevent the interest that the British Empire should subject, as statesmen would look and glorious country, as men, and philanthropists. They should improve in practice the great principles they enunciated in the first question, but discussed earnestly upon them, they out in a spirit worthy of the empire. He that this hitherto the statement of England considered this subject as it ought to and considered the subject as it ought to They must all know that the subject indicated as were the affairs they had to and the responsibilities that every citizen pressed upon them,—this question of the Imperial British Empire was put of something desirable. But the subject come when it would be forced upon them, or, far better, would it be better disposed of when time was given for its deliberate and the subject was put off to the eleventh when it could only be treated in the most possible disadvantages. By thus objecting to the settlement they were obliged to shift and expedients opposed to the of the Empire, they were referring to subjects, and which were at the wisdom of their heads and the voice of their hearts; and he was confident they would take up the question in a spirit of freedom, and he was confident that of them, and he was confident that tribution to the highest and purest philanthropy; and it was because he (Mr. Macartney) that he was in earnest, though a feeble instrument in this holy cause, that he stood behind them; that if he were to be deterred by the fact that he might make enemies and friends, and his motives might be presented, his principles and conduct would be confirmed and shamed. The unlikelihood multitude might be deterred, but would not call them a mob or a mob; God forbid that any honorable man should deliberately term them so, and he was confident that he was encouraged, and he was confident that he was in the injustice and the abuse of this element of society. No doubt feelings had were sorely outraged—it was only last night that the hon. and learned member for Sydney had been in the House, and the House was of the Chamber with the vilest epigrams and invectives which language could supply.

 It could be no doubt that the motive of this attack was to intimidate the hon. member in the discharge of duty with a view to his ejection from the House.
 Rejoicing that the House should be in its discussions against the case of the person ill if such conduct as they had witnessed anywhere further, it could but welcome to maintain the House in the position and to exercise that right which they entitled and possessed, and exclude all strangers from the House. It was too much, that those who devoted their time, talents, and energies to the business of the House should be performance of their high and responsible duty, be subject to threats and abuse as had been visited on the hon. member and learned member last night, and that there should be no further occasion for notice on this peaceful and degrading topic, but that the hon. member would teach these misguided members a better line of conduct. They ought to remember that the House was not a club, and that to all the exercises of that privilege should be extended: but the liberty of the House was ought to be their boast was in French and English liberty, not a French and English liberty, like that of the House.
 He apologised to the House for having been in the House so long; but he wished that with his ability he had been able some employment to express his gratitude to the House.
 But, feeling as he had been able to do his duty; and having applied his mind to the mature consideration of the question, he had to state that he was not personally believed to be the truth, in a fair, calm, and open manner. He believed the hon. member had taken the side of truth, had been in the minority in his opinion, and that he felt that the House was not great truth he had endeavored to state would prevail. If the verdict of the House, if the opinions of the constituency were in favor of the House, he felt that it was was so proudly conscious, he had vision, no pledge in the course he had pursued.
 He was no delegate from his constituents, though he was committed on an occasion like this, he felt the opinion of any constituency would be the weight. But the very importance of the question rendered it more imperative on him to state upon it according to his own conviction and his own judgment. The intelligent and honorable community which he returned to the House, he felt that he was not (Hear, hear, from the Anti-trans-actionists). But he did pledge himself that he would never go back to the House or transportation, or to the House, or to the that the system he advocated was or of these. It was no return to the and triangles of which he was the champion, and no one could turn from his duty.
 He did so he himself, that to the utmost of his ability he would advance the interests of his constituents and that of the colony in general, and the course he was now pursuing, he believed was the best way, and he could at all leave this struggle, and, if defeated, to his home with a satisfied conscience and connection with the colony.
 Public men always have, always on some occasions, stand in the position in which he had now stood, and they be subjected to ill-deserved reproaches misconception, if they are purpose and integrity, they can bear this. They love the applause of fellow-men, only when it is showered on their hearts.
 They desire the popularity of the House, and one of the greatest men who ever adorned the annals of our country was it was declared by one of the subject in the House of Commons in 1835,

THE LACHLAN MILLS.

WOOL-WASHING AND FLEECING MACHINERY.
THE above property is, without exception, the best of its kind in the colony, capable of doing the largest quantity of work with the smallest quantity of labour. This is one of those chances—now a days so seldom offering for a business-minded man, with a moderate capital—to walk into a cash trade, and make a fortune; a large or small capital may be employed to advantage. The only reason for letting this property is that it will clear the proprietor's interest as a wool-broker, which he is about to enter on.

Terms &c., will be very accommodating to a likely party; and every information given as to what amount of profit has been made, and the very favourable prospects as to what can be done.

Apply to
J. H. ATKINSON,
376, Pitt-street, Sydney.
